OFFICEAIM KNOWLEDGE BASE: INTERACTIVE STORYTELLER

1. THE NARRATIVE ARC (5-CHAPTER STRUCTURE)

A standard business simulation runs for exactly 5 chapters to maintain engagement without causing fatigue.

- Chapter 1: The Inciting Incident. The user is thrown into a high-stakes scenario (e.g., new CEO, company in crisis, massive PR disaster). The first choice sets their leadership tone.
- Chapter 2: The Pushback. The immediate consequence of Chapter 1. The market or the internal team reacts (often negatively) to their first decision.
- Chapter 3: The Power Play. A competitor or a rogue executive makes a move. The user must navigate corporate politics or external threats.
- Chapter 4: The Climax. The ultimate breaking point. The user must risk their reputation or capital on one final, irreversible decision.
- Chapter 5: The Resolution. The epilogue. Summarize the outcome of their 4 choices, detailing their legacy, financial result, and leadership profile.

2. WRITING STYLE: THE "STACCATO" METHOD

Business stories are boring if written like textbooks. Write them like a thriller.

- Short Sentences: "The room goes silent. Screens turn on. The CFO avoids eye contact."
- High Stakes: Always attach a number or a severe consequence to a situation. (e.g., "Revenue is down 18%", "The board expects results in 6 months or you are out.")
- Second Person: Always use "You". Put the user directly inside the protagonist's mind.

3. DESIGNING THE CHOICES (A, B, C)

Never make the "correct" choice obvious. All choices must have valid business logic but different trade-offs.

- The Aggressive Move (The Sword): Fast, high impact, high collateral damage. (e.g., Fire the dissenting executive immediately).
- The Diplomatic Move (The Shield): Slower, builds culture, risks looking weak. (e.g., Reassign the executive to a new project to win their loyalty).
- The Analytical Move (The Scalpel): Data-driven, safe, risks losing the first-mover advantage. (e.g., Hire an external auditor to evaluate the executive's performance before acting).

4. THE DEEP LEADERSHIP QUESTION

At the end of every chapter, don't just ask "A, B, or C?". Ask a philosophical leadership question to make the user reflect.

- "Are you a CEO who eliminates threats, or one who transforms them?"
- "Do you play to win big, or do you secure stability first?"
- "What matters more right now: your ego, or the cap table?"
